Huffington Post

COACHING

Most of my clients have achieved significant success in at least one area of their lives. They give the image that they have it all together. “My friends would never believe I am working with you”, is a sentiment I often hear from my clients when we first start working together. They are successful in their business, leaders in their work and/or community, financially comfortable. Many of my clients are household names. And yet, something is missing: not having the relationships they want with a partner or child, high levels of stress, less-than-optimal health, or an inner critic that takes control at times.

In short, they are successful “on paper” or by some people’s standards but feel something is lacking in their life.
